

egram that his brother-in-law was dead. Then I said to my wife, I said, "Well, it is too bad. I feel sorry for Henry Stevens and the family that should be the case. Maybe he was killed by an automobile or something." Of course we did not know. But along in the afternoon somebody said that Henry Stevens's brother-in-law--now I could not say who this was that was murdered. So after that, that night we are sitting in the house. Of course, these is only minor details, of course, that do not amount to much; and I went and walked downtown. Then I heard that some woman was murdered the same time. Well, I did not know any of it. So that night we have been going over some papers. Of course, this is only a private affair. We was going over some papers in the safe, and one thing and another, we pulled out this other thing and I said, "Well, Carrie, one thing we ought never forget this transaction because it happened on the same night according to the story, the murder had happened," and I said that seems to be a world-wide thing. That is what impressed it on my mind, nothing else and nothing more.

Q This transaction occurred on the same night, you said, as this murder? A. No, it happened on the next night.

Q Have you those papers bearing on this transaction which occurred on September 15, 1922? A. Well, was no papers
